In the meantime Anand was steadily diffusing the Polgar initiative, leaving her saddled with static weaknesses. Yes, she had an open g–file, but when he defended the only point of attack she had nothing much to do but wait. The Indian cobra moved slowly forward on the queenside until, in his victim's time–trouble, he suddenly struck with a deadly blow - a knight sacrifice on c3. Polgar averted both immediate mate and losing on time but, although only a pawn down, her position was in total ruins and she resigned.

"While all the games have been watched with interest, the most eagerly followed encounter was Leko-Topalov. The Bulgarian essayed the same risky line which brought him spectacular success against Kramnik at the Corus Tournament back in January. Leko had clearly anticipated this eventuality and massed his forces with great purposefulness in the center. Topalov had secured his long-term advantages - the two bishops and his opponent's wayward knight - but lagged so severely in development, with his king stuck in the middle, that his situation was exceedingly precarious. Leko missed an excellent opportunity to rip open the center with 17.f4!, opting instead for a "solid" king move. Nevertheless he still maintained a promising position. However, with the tension mounting he accidentally allowed the exchange of queens, after which the initiative vanished in a puff of smoke. All the trumps were suddenly in Topalov's hands. Leko's dubious position disintegrated altogether in time-trouble, although it was doubtful he would have survived even with an extra hour on the clock. He resigned on move 40. This was quite a blow for the number three seed as he rarely loses with white." Short.
